

FLEXIBILITY AND CROSS-AGENCY COLLABORATION USING NUIX

CHALLENGE

A US government agency needed a way to get over 50 non-technical investigators and staff to collaboratively review digital evidence. The agency also needed to work securely with other agencies on cases, with transferrable case data to bridge the gap between air-gapped networks.

“We were one of the first agencies to roll out [Nuix Investigate®] and helped pioneer its adoption and real use case requirements.”

SOLUTION

“We saw a demonstration of [Nuix Investigate] in its infancy,” said an employee with the Federal Agency. “We were one of the first agencies to roll out [Nuix Investigate] and helped pioneer its adoption and real use case requirements.”

The agency worked closely with Nuix to develop a solution that fit its unique needs, incorporating Nuix into a workflow that already included core Nuix data processing and discovery capabilities. The project team at the agency worked directly with Nuix developers and support staff to address specific issues or bugs in the tools.

Especially critical was ensuring that the solution worked on the agency's internal network and securely over the internet to allow cross-agency collaboration.

RESULTS

Case data in Nuix Investigate is accessible to a wider range of end users with minimal training requirements or technical background.

Reviewers in a variety of roles, within the agency and in partner agencies, are able to collaborate together on data that would have been otherwise inaccessible to them previously.

“From an end user perspective, they've had a much easier time navigating their data with [Nuix Investigate] than with previous review platforms,” said the agency's project manager, “because of the user interface and layout, with fairly minimal training.”
